

Introduction to Mindfulness Meditation Class 4 – Mindfulness of Thinking

Adapted with permission from a handout by Gil Fronsdal, at our sister center, Insight Meditation Center

Introduction

Sometimes people think that the point of meditation is to stop thinking -- to have a silent mind. This does happen occasionally, but it is not necessarily the point of meditation. Thoughts are an important part of life, and mindfulness practice is not supposed to be a struggle against them. It's more useful to be friends with our thoughts than considering them unfortunate distractions. In mindfulness, we are not stopping thoughts as much as overcoming any preoccupations we have with them.

Mindfulness is not thinking about things. (It is not "meditating on" some topic, as people often say.) It is a non-discursive observation of all aspects of our life. In moments when thinking predominates, mindfulness is the clear, silent, awareness that we are thinking. I found it helpful when someone said, "For the purpose of meditation, nothing is particularly worth thinking about." Thoughts can come and go, and the meditator does not need to become involved with them. We are not interested in engaging with the content of our thoughts; mindfulness of thinking is simply recognizing that we are thinking.

Mindfulness of Thinking

In meditation, when thoughts are subtle and in the background, or when random thoughts pull you away from awareness of the present, it is enough to resume mindfulness of breathing. However, when your preoccupation with thoughts is stronger than your ability to easily let go of them, then direct your mindfulness to being clearly aware that thinking is occurring.

Strong bouts of thinking are fueled largely by identification and preoccupation with thoughts. By clearly observing our thinking, we step outside the field of identification and can recognize that we are not our thoughts. Thinking will usually then soften to a calm and unobtrusive stream.

Sometimes thinking can be strong and compulsive even while we are aware of it. When this happens, it can be useful to notice how such thinking is affecting your body, physically and energetically. It may cause pressure in the head, tension in the forehead, tightness of the shoulders, or a buzzing as if the head were filled with thousands of bumblebees. Let your mindfulness feel the sensations of tightness, pressure, or whatever you discover. It is easy to be caught up in the story of these preoccupying thoughts, but if you feel the physical sensation of thinking, then you are bringing attention to the present moment rather than the storyline of the thoughts.

When a particular theme keeps reappearing in our thinking, it is likely that it is being triggered by a strong emotion. In that case, no matter how many times you recognize a repeated thought or concern, come back to the breath. If the associated emotion isn't recognized, the concern is liable to keep reappearing. For example, people who plan a lot, often find that planning thoughts arise out of apprehension. If they do not acknowledge the fear, the fear will be a factory of new planning thoughts. If there is a repetitive thought pattern, see if you can discover an emotion associated with it, and then practice mindfulness of the emotion. Ground yourself in the present moment in the emotion itself. When you acknowledge the emotion, often it will cease generating those particular thoughts.

Thoughts are a large part of our lives. Many of us spend much time inhabiting the cognitive world of stories and ideas. Mindfulness practice won't stop the thinking, but it will help prevent us from compulsively following thoughts that have appeared. This will help us become more balanced, so our physical, emotional and cognitive sides all work together as a whole.

Mindfulness Exercises for the Fourth Week

- Extend your daily meditation session to 30 minutes. For at least the first ten minutes, keep your meditation simple -- focus on the breath. As best you can, when some other experience gets in the way of being with the breath, simply let it go and return to the breath. After this warm-up period, switch to more open mindfulness: continue with the breath until something else becomes more compelling. When a physical sensation, emotion or thought process predominates, turn your meditative awareness to it. When nothing else is compelling, come back to the breathing.
- Spend some time reflecting on the assumptions, attitudes and beliefs you have about your thoughts. Do you usually assume that they are either true, false, right or wrong? Do you identify with your thoughts? That is, do you think that what you think defines who you are? Do you believe that thinking will solve your problems or that it is the only means to understand something? After reflecting on this alone, have a conversation with someone about what you have discovered.
- Once during the next week, spend a two-hour period tracking the kinds of things you think about. Find a way to remind yourself every few minutes to notice what you are thinking. Are the thoughts primarily self-referential or primarily about others? Do they tend to be critical or judgmental? What is the frequency of thoughts of "should" or "ought"? Are the thoughts mostly directed to the future, to the past, or toward fantasy? Do you tend more toward optimistic or pessimistic thoughts? Do your thoughts tend to be apprehensive or peaceful? Contented or dissatisfied? This is not an exercise in judging, but in simply noticing. Most people live in their thoughts. Regularly and frequently stepping outside of the thought-stream for two hours allows us to take up residence, albeit briefly, in a mindful awareness that is bigger than the thinking mind.
- Once during the next week, spend a two-hour period giving particular attention to your intentions. Before we speak or act there is always an impulse of motivation or intention. Notice the various kinds of desires and aversions that fuel your intentions. For this exercise, you might choose a period where you can go about an ordinary activity in a quiet, mostly undisturbed, way. Perhaps slow your activities down so that you are more likely to notice and evaluate your motivations.

Mindfulness in Daily Life

As in meditation, it's possible to develop greater presence and awareness in daily life. Some people find it useful to have cues throughout the day reminding them to notice what happens in the present— what they are doing, feeling, or thinking. A common cue is the phone ringing. Rather than immediately answering the phone, the ringing is a prompt to be mindful. It's also a great way to prepare for the phone conversation.

Some people use walking through doorways as a mindfulness cue. Whenever they walk through a doorway into a different room they notice and pay attention to what is happening with themselves and in the new room. Waiting for traffic lights to turn green can be another cue for a bit of mindfulness.

It can also be useful to bring a heightened mindfulness to particular daily tasks. Some people do this by choosing to eat one meal a day in silence without doing anything else besides eating. Others will do mindfulness while walking – some people will park in a distant parking place so as to have a short period of walking meditation. Cleaning can also be a great time to cultivate mindfulness.

A fascinating area for mindfulness is during a conversation. Much can be discovered by listening more actively and tracking one's internal responses and impulses during the conversation. The qualities needed to listen well are the same qualities needed to meditate well.